As a concerned CDL driver, not only am i concerned with the safety of my family but the safety of everyone else.....there are many many different scenarios that i could go on on about and the human is always trying to eliminate the human aspects of a job ....wich i will never understand....most corporations are trying to make cost of hauling their freight cheaper....and insurance cost.lets face it computers fail!!!!!!

Ive been around trucks since i was knee high to a corn stock and it only getting worss out here.....the computer to hold all the info to give the truck all the programming to avoid a crash in every situation out here would be as big as the truck its self...not to mention the things we can. Ill give you one scenario that will be an eye opener....truck traveling at 65 mph down the interstate with a 48000 lb coil on the flatbed trailer.....car with a person on there cell phone in there hand not paying attention realises at the last min it needs to get off the interstate and cuts over on you and slams on the brakes to avoid traffic on the off ramp....you have just enough room to squeeze between that car and the traffic in the passing lane...there is no program that anyone can write for a computer to react and adjust in that amount of time...were talking splits of a second....

Ty for your time
