

Rick Daniels - Comments

Self driving CMVs should never be allowed on the road due to the countless accidents that have already happened.

For the past 7 years I have been a Vehicle Operation Assistant for the USPS.

We have a hard enough time implementing a secure yard as it is.

How is a non-driverless vehicle going to be able to navigate around our yard without the human element?

We have drivers and employees who could pop out in front of any of these vehicles at any time.

What is the response time going to be? How many people will get hurt or killed as a result.

There are no parameters in place to have a correct response to someone walking out in front of you.

A driverless vehicle will not be able to have the same response time as a human driver.

No way for this to happen. The safety and welfare of everyone around these vehicles is crucial.

Tesla used their "auto pilot" system and it killed the driver when the car drove into a tractor trailer.

There has to be a human element for communication purposes which a Self driving CMV tractor trailer cannot provide.

Uber's self driving system killed a homeless person during 2019.

There are other instances that show that this system is unsafe along with others like it.

If one of your family members was killed would you still be in favor of a driverless vehicle?

I do not understand why anyone would want this.

If you are a rich owner of this company they are the only ones to gain from this.

Anyone else who goes along with this is just kidding themselves.

When a self driving truck reaches its destination who will unload or load it.

A lot of truckers move their own freight.

What about dropping full loads and hooking up to another trailer or navigating thru a yard?

You will always need a skilled operator in the cab.

If one of these vehicles comes upon an accident how will it react?

Will it help save human lives by diverting its path? No way for it to do that.

I believe there will be countless lives lost as a result of this system and it is not good for the trucking industry as a whole.

Nothing good will come of this except for the owner of the vehicles will get rich.

This is until they get sued for the countless deaths they cause.