One of the problems that will occur is with driverless trucks platooning or just one truck driving on a highway with exits. Is the cars and trucks who at the last minute either on purpose or by inept thinking take an exit right in front of a driverless vehicle a human usually hits the brakes to avoid collisions if enough time is there to do it and on wet or snowed road surfaces a lot of times have wrecks. So I think the same is probably going to happen and if the driverless truck kills others if it jackknifes who is going to be liable? I'm sure the car that cut it off will be long gone and in the rain or snow more than likely not identifiable! Just some to think about
