in a word NO.

I have never had a mirror fail. I have had sensors, Blind spot indicators and cameras fail. Tell me, if the electrics go dead do the cameras work?

The best thing for my safety would be for NHTSA to stop making new regulations and be cut back 90% staff and budget.

Do you jackasses even drive a car? I bet you never studied how much more difficult it is to see past an A pillar that has an air bag in it. The A pillar on my car is so thick it can completely hide a mother with a baby stroller and one toddler walking on side at a cross walk. I have seen it.

If it weren't for government regulations we would still be able to see out of our cars with our eyes.

And let's not forget the TPMS sensors that are on everyone's car because a few fools let air out of their tires to run on sand dunes and then drove home without pumping them up. Of course, they failed on the highway then the fools...having no idea how to drive...manage to roll their vehicles. Now we all have these things, WHICH WEAR OUT EVERY 6 YRS because of what a dozen fools? Meanwhile TPMS makes it so more expensive that it is too expensive for many to have a spare set of wheels with dedicated snow tires on them. So people are driving around on sub optimal tires in the snow, thanks to your great 'safety advance'.

And by the way, whenever there is a Docket comment opportunity publicized there is never a hot link to the place where you can comment. Gee. I wonder why that is.
