

Comment from Craig McKee

I believe that when we achieve a measurable portion of self driving cars on the roads, that overall safety will increase. Change is hard, especially considering a technology that has been with us for over 100 years. However, as people become less interested in the 'mundane' chore of driving and their attention is constantly being challenged, having systems in place that do nothing but pay attention to that purpose, will have an overall net safety gain. At 59 years old and an avid driving enthusiast, I welcome a vehicle to handle my daily commutes so I can remain safe and alive to enjoy driving myself when the opportunities exist.
