I completely support rear-view cameras in lieu of mirrors. The tech is truly settled and reliable, and the benefits can be life-saving. Today, we've accepted that backup cameras have clearly presented daily benefit, but almost exclusively in very low speed circumstances. I'm absolutely positive it has saved people a lot of money, time, and frustration. But having that same advantage when driving would unquestionably have even more positive impact. Mirrors simply cannot catch everything because of their required locations and, sometimes, size. A mirror's field of vision simply cannot compete with a camera and even only-decent software. What are we waiting for?!
