

Comment from Andrew Martin

I do not believe these standards adequately address vehicle safety for those outside of the vehicle. Technologies like automated braking are not proven to be effective and have the potential to fail. Vehicles should be rated for safety for those outside of them and manufacturers should be held to standards promoting safety in the event of a collision. You have standards to protect people in cars, you should have standards to protect people outside of cars as well.