I have been driving a tractor trailer for 40 years. I have no accidents been with they same company for 25 years. The company I drive for is under new management so three years ago they decided they needed cameras in the trucks well it wasn't bad the first year and a half. They decided to turn the sensitivity up on the cameras so now if the driver gets close to a line on the road the camera starts recording and a red light starts flashing to let the driver know he has been recorded. So now drivers are watching cameras to see when they are being recorded so we are not doing anything that will get you wrote up and maybe fired . So we feel like we have someone standing over our shoulders ready to say got you so instead of being a safety tool it basically has turned into a disciplining tool . A safety tool would be recording outside the truck only, not recording what the driver is doing
